Summary	A guest lecture by Ms. Nihar Sharma was conducted for the MBA first semester students on the 6th of September. The speaker Ms. Sharma held an interactive session within the classroom, to guide students on how they can realize their true potential and subsequently attain it. She asked the students to ponder over some of the simplest questions like what truly made them happy or where they saw themselves in a decade's time. Her motivation here was to lead the students to the path of 'Self -Concept Clarity' which refers to the extent with which self-beliefs are clearly and confidently defined and consistent. The concept of SCC is a mere pathway that one might opt for, for making more defined career or personal decisions. Ms. Sharma insisted on students having a clear meaning of success, so they can perhaps take more organized steps towards the eventuality. Ms. Sharma, reminiscing an anecdote from recent past, told the students about how a highly educated, immensely successful colleague of hers, lost his high paying job as he became oblivious to what motivated him. The world we live in today, sets both professional and personal standards for us to achieve as we grow leaving no space for any errors. She further told the students how they have all the liberty to break free from those rules as long as they know what it was that would keep them going. She made clear how dreams and goals are transient. She wound up by mentioning how setting smaller, more attainable goals help us become more receptive to ideas and aware of ourselves and consequently help us in achieving, our ultimate dreams. In totality the session was insightful albeit short. The students had positive excerpts to take back with them.
